

identify drowsy drivers and cite, as appropriate. States should enact and enforce laws prohibiting drowsy driving.

IV. Law Enforcement

Each State should ensure that State and community distracted and drowsy driving programs include a law enforcement component. States should provide guidance and support to:

- Develop protocols and training for law enforcement to identify the signs associated with distracted and drowsy driving and how the established laws in the State can and should be enforced;
- Develop protocols and training for law enforcement in recognizing the involvement of distraction and drowsiness in motor vehicle crashes;
- Ensure that police crash reports include designations for driver distractions and driver drowsiness/fatigue as contributory factors to crashes;
- Identify locations where drowsy driving crashes are most likely to occur and conduct enforcement efforts, as appropriate;
- Conduct regular enforcement, as well as high visibility enforcement, to address distracted driving and drowsy driving;
- Consider a special task force to deal exclusively with crash investigations thought to be the result of distracted and drowsy driving;
- Coordinate with educational and engineering activities;
- As needed, update the State's crash reporting form to be Model Minimum Uniform Crash Criteria (MMUCC) compliant with regard to distracted and drowsy driving codes; and
- Establish appropriate internal policies to limit distraction and institute fatigue management programs for law enforcement and other emergency personnel.

V. Highway and Traffic Engineering

Including a highway and traffic engineering component can be especially important in drowsy and distracted driving crashes. Each State should consider a network level crash analysis or review of policy and standards to ensure the benefits of shoulder and center rumble strips placed on appropriate roads and work with local/State policymakers to have them installed. States should also consider improvements to the safety and availability of safe roadway rest stops to allow for rest and/or time to make phone calls, etc. States should include improved lighting uniformity at rest stops; this provides an environment where drivers may feel it is safer to stop and rest.

VI. Communication Program

Each State should ensure that State and local programs contain a comprehensive communication component to support program and policy efforts, inclusive of social media and other relevant mediums that resonate with target audiences. The communication program should coordinate with law enforcement, businesses, health/medical, school- and college-based programs, and media outlets to share safety messages and campaign information. Communication programs and materials should be language and culturally relevant, and should address issues such as:

- Risks associated with distracted and drowsy driving;
- Signs and symptoms of distracted driving;
- Signs and symptoms of drowsy driving, including medicines and sleep disorders;
- Types of distractions beyond talking on a cell phone and texting, such as eating and drinking, using a GPS, grooming, etc.;
- Risks associated with distracted walking and bicycling;
- Countermeasures for dealing with distraction and drowsiness while driving;
- Laws and enforcement of laws, as appropriate; and
- Use of special events such as nationally recognized safety and injury prevention weeks to highlight the risks and dangers of distracted and drowsy driving.

VII. Driver Education and Licensing

Younger drivers are at risk for both distracted and drowsy driving. As such, each State should coordinate distracted and drowsy driving information and outreach plans using educational and other collateral materials, and include issues of distracted and drowsy driving in licensing programs (including Graduated Driver Licensing), both in classroom and behind the wheel. Each State should include information on distracted and drowsy driving in the driver licensing manual and driver licensing test questions.

VIII. Evaluation

Both problem identification and evaluation of distracted and drowsy driving crashes can be difficult. Often, a surviving driver may be reluctant to admit having been distracted or drowsy following a crash. However, each State can promote effective evaluation by:

- Supporting detailed analysis of police crash reports involving distracted and drowsy drivers;
- Evaluating the effectiveness of educational and communication programs by measuring behavior, knowledge, and attitude changes;
- Conducting and publicizing statewide surveys of public knowledge and attitude about distracted and drowsy driving;
- Conducting and publicizing observational surveys of driver distraction;
- Using available data to identify at-risk populations; and
- Ensuring that evaluation results are used to identify problems, plan new programs and improve existing programs and strategies.
